Mr. Whistler's "Ten O'Clock". Whistler was one of the most original, if also tirelessly self-promoting artists of the later 19th century. After his disastrous run-in with John Ruskin, the greatest critic of the previous generation, Whistler poured his thoughts and feelings about art into this lecture, which made him if anything more notorious, but was also widely admired for its insights and wit.

On February 20, 1885, Whistler delivered the "Ten O'Clock," an hour-long public lecture on art, to an audience composed of fashionable Londoners including artists, dealers, and members of the press. He chose the unconventional time—two hours later than most evening events—to ensure a crowd, and he enlisted the services of the theatrical producer Richard D'Oyly Carte and Carte's manager, Helen Lenoir, to secure the venue in Piccadilly, promote the event, and sell tickets.
