During World War II, large MCM forces ensured troop landings at Okinawa and Normandy. 3 Unfortunately, less than a decade later, the U.S. mine-warfare fleet in the Pacific had shrunk to a mere ten vessels. 4 This proved nearly catastrophic during the amphibious landings on the Korean Peninsula, as the North Koreans, with Soviet assistance, had laid 3,000 mines in and around Wonsan harbor. 5 The advance force commander at Wonsan, Rear Admiral Allan E. Smith, said, "We have lost control of ...

Mine Warfare Needs a New Concept of Operations ...

Based on the committee's review of previous reports and the knowledge and experience of many of its members, it seems clear that the Navy's relative inattention to mine warfare is a natural legacy of its historical focus on blue-water operations, from the battleship Navy prior to World War II through the postwar deep-water carrier/ nuclear-powered attack submarine Navy—a focus that was diverted toward near-shore operations only sporadically during the 20th century (except during World ...
