Smara, The Forbidden City is a true story. In the fall of 1930, a young Frenchman named Michel Vieuchange staggered out of the Moroccan desert into the town of Tiznit where he collapsed, wracked by dysentery; a few days later, he was dead. Two months earlier, on the evening of September 10, Vieuchange had stripped off his European clothing, draped himself in the costume of a Berber woman, and set off into the unexplored regions of southern Morocco.

I get the sense that Smara was not a forbidden "holy" city, off limits to non-Moslems for religious reasons, like Mecca and Medina. Rather, I believe, the "exclusion" of Europeans was due more to the antipathy the Moors and the Arabs of the Western Sahara bore towards Europeans, especially the French and Spanish, on account of their colonialist history.
