Richard Southern's The Making of the Middle Ages is a remarkably good book. I decided to read it after learning in Norman Cantor's Inventing the Middle Ages that Cantor considers it one of the two greatest books on medieval history written in the 20th century, and possibly the most influential.

Put simply, the subtitle of
'War, Deceit, Imperial Folly and the making of the modern Middle East' is a far more apt designation for Scott Anderson's work. Anderson gives the reader an intriguing cast of characters, whose stories are told through an almost fiction-like narrative from the perspective of four main players, with a 'supporting cast' filling in the blanks to make for a compelling historical account.

That history raises questions about taking the robustness of the middle class as the measure of a society's stability and democratic promise. Those questions are among the many stimulated by The Making of the Middle Class, which invites critical conversation about capitalism, imperialism, postcolonialism, modernity, and our neoliberal present.
